

THE TRUE STORY.

Deputy Marshal Glasner Cheekily Assumes Credit for the Arrest of Morris.

The Salt Lake Tribune of Sunday made another bad break in its account of the arrest of the child-beater Morris and his wife. If inaccuracy were its only fault, the "customary attitude" of that journal would not call for remark or rebuke; but as the article does gross injustice to City Marshal Brown, and, if inspired by Mr. Glasner, exhibits rank ingratitude on his part, a full explanation of the circumstances attending the arrest is necessary to disprove the statement that "To him and him alone (Glasner) belongs all the credit." We have waited one day in the hope that Mr. Glasner would correct the erroneous narrative of the Tribune, failing in which our reporter yesterday interviewed Marshal Brown and obtained the following "true story:"

The warrant for the arrest of Morris had been in the hands of deputy marshal Young for some time, when marshal Shaughnessy became irritated at the delay and sent Glasner to Ogden, giving him two days in which to find his man. Glasner was specially instructed to enlist the services of marshal Brown, and if Morris was not arrested within the specified time, the warrant was to remain in Mr. Brown's hands.

Our marshal put on special police, and himself and three other officers hunted for Morris until 12 o'clock Friday night, visiting the resorts which the offender was supposed to frequent. The search was continued on Saturday, and between four and five o'clock in the afternoon Morris was found in a large frame house on Fifth Street, where he and his wife had been boarding. After a delay of some twenty minutes the officers were admitted, and the marshal started off in search of Glasner, leaving the prisoners in charge of officers H. C. Pender and Gilbert Belknap. A search of over an hour resulted in the discovery of Glasner, and in the presence of U. S. Commissioner Alexander he was informed that the parties had been captured and were held subject to his order. Glasner stepped into Mr. Brown's carriage, and was driven to where Morris was held waiting, and thence to the depot, arriving just in time to catch the Salt Lake train.

Marshal Brown is just recovering from a severe attack of rheumatism, and, being unable to walk with ease, was compelled to hire a carriage. His expenses in the affair foot up $15, besides the labor of himself and officers. This amount Mr. Glasner promised to send to Mr. Brown on Monday morning, but up to last evening "the color of his money" was not distinguishable.

If any special credit attaches to Mr. Glasner in the face of these facts, which can be substantiated on demand, he is welcome to it, such as it is.
